

MANY WAYS UP LLC PRESENTS

The Boy, The Dog, and the Tomato

Volume 1 — The Beginning

A story about a boy with a big heart, a dog that never stops, and a neighborhood that needed someone to believe it could be better.

Written by Jermaine Patterson
Many Ways Up LLC | Minneapolis, Minnesota
ourtentcity@gmail.com

*Volume 1 is unfinished by design. The story ends where it is — still building.
Because the real story is still being written.*

CHAPTER 1

The Boy Has No Name Yet

There was once a boy who lived in a neighborhood full of people. He noticed things. He noticed the man sleeping on the bench who did not know where to find warmth. He noticed the woman who needed one day of work to keep her phone on. He noticed the family that had almost lost everything and was quietly trying to put it back together. The boy wanted to help all of them. But nobody knew his name yet.

CHAPTER 2

He Gets His Name

One day the boy walked to the town hall and told them who he was and what he wanted to do. They wrote his name in a big book. It cost him almost everything he had saved. But from that day on, when he knocked on doors, people listened differently. He had a name now. Many Ways Up.

CHAPTER 3

The Three Things He Built

The boy built three things with his own hands. The first was a board on the corner of every street that showed people where to find help — food, warmth, a place to sleep. The second was a list on the fence where people could post small jobs and other people could earn a little money doing them. The third was a game where people earned points for every good step they took — getting their papers, finding a place to stay, learning something new — and the points became real money. Three things. One neighborhood. One boy.

CHAPTER 4

The Dog Finds People

The boy could not be everywhere at once. But the dog could. Every morning the dog ran through the neighborhood finding the people who needed the board, the fence, and the game. The dog never got tired. It never asked for anything in return. It just ran and came back and ran again.

CHAPTER 5

The Letter to the Town Council

One thing bothered the boy more than anything. When people in his neighborhood fell on hard times — lost a job, got sick, had something go wrong — they could lose their home too fast. There was no second chance built into the rules. So the boy wrote a letter. He asked his neighbors to sign it. He asked the town council to give people two months to get back on their feet before they lost everything. More and more people signed. The boy was not just helping people anymore. He was trying to change the rules.

CHAPTER 6

The Tomato

In a small corner of the yard the boy had planted a tomato plant. It grew more tomatoes than he could ever eat. He did not know what to do with the extra ones until the dog led him to a neighbor who was hungry. He left the tomatoes on her doorstep with a note. She left a note back saying thank you. The boy thought — what if everyone who had extra could find the people who needed it? He wrote that idea in his notebook.

CHAPTER 7

The Hardware Store

The boy had bigger plans now. He needed tools he did not have. He went to the hardware store and asked to borrow them. The owner looked at him carefully. He said — I like your ideas, son. But I need to know you return what you borrow before I give you the good tools. So the boy started small. He borrowed a hammer. He returned it the next day. He borrowed a saw. He returned it early. Every time he borrowed something he brought it back before it was due. The owner watched. And slowly, slowly, the owner started trusting him with bigger things.

CHAPTER 8

The Story Is Not Over

The boy had not finished yet. His plans were still growing. The dog was still running. The tomato plant had more seeds. The hardware store owner was starting to trust him with bigger tools. And every day more people in the neighborhood knew his name. He did not know exactly what came next. But he kept going. Because that is what you do when you know something matters.

END OF VOLUME 1

Volume 1 ends here on purpose. The Many Ways Up story is still being written. The platforms are built. The petition is live. The credit is being built. The breakthrough has not happened yet. This is the honest ending — still building, still moving, still heading somewhere real.

Volume 2 will be written when the next chapter happens.

Follow the journey at manywaysup.com